

you just walked in, looked around, saw the little rusty button—miss it if you blink— that's why, almost never, but not quite actually never.... Somebody slows down, looks at the thing... starts to wonder what sort of thing it is, thinks... it would be cool to get a closer look at that button... they stand there, dead still right in the middle of the morning rush, people streaming by... a constant never ending. stream ... just standing right on the edge of a thought. but... no, it's gone. go back to normal, but maybe once in a while remembering there was something over there, there was something over there they were gonna listened... they thought maybe... what was it again. something were they gonna look at something over that way... where even was that again?

occasionally doodling idly on the train, their doodles, turning into a half assed attempt at sort of a map.. a map to nothing. no reason.

just something about this place that you can almost remember the way back to ... but what was it about that place...

after a while, the guy just sits on the train all day, doodling. sometimes, it's that map. just sitting on the train, trying to figure out what that thought was that seemed like it should be something really... something was there a thing there ... something interesting or... maybe I dropped something. and I was gonna get it back. but I can't think of what's gone missing. was i gonna look at something? did I wanna walk around somewhere?

then the guy next to me on the train points at my doodle and says... oh man, the button at 42nd St.... let's go push it Ohhh... shit. I can't believe I forgot.

Yeah... Let's go push it.
